In our lives and as part of organizations, workplaces, and movements, many of us play different roles in pursuit of equity, inclusion, and justice. Some of us are newcomers and don't know where to start, while others of us are experienced and may be fatigued and seeking new tools and the solidarity of others.

On June 6, spend the day with national leaders from the Building Movement Project and Solidarity Is to (re)discover your role(s) in social change work with a framework that can anchor and guide you. If you're new to this work, learn the principles of transformative solidarity practice that move us all beyond buzzwords and hashtags to show up for one another. If you're experienced and feeling burned out, gain tools and resources to build up your capacity and well-being to sustain solidarity and social change practices. Connect with others committed to this learning and work!

Deepa Iyer is Sr. Director of Strategic Initiatives at Building Movement Project, where she leads projects on solidarity and social movements, conducts trainings, uplifts narratives through the Solidarity Is This podcast, and facilitates solidarity strategy for cohorts and networks. Previously, she served as executive director of South Asian Americans Leading Together (SAALT) for a decade, and also held positions at Race Forward, the US Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division, the Asian Pacific American Legal Resource Center, and the Asian American Justice Center.

UyenThi Tran Myhre is the Movement Building Coordinator with the Building Movement Project, supporting communications work, curriculum development and trainings, and solidarity cohorts. Prior to joining BMP, UyenThi held leadership roles at the YMCA of the North Equity Innovation Center and the University of Minnesota Women's Center, where she worked with college students, K-12 and higher education faculty and staff, as well as nonprofit professionals in various sectors.

Adaku Utah serves as the Senior Manager of Movement Building Programs at the Building Movement Project. Born in Baltimore, Maryland, raised in Festac, Nigeria, grounded in her legacy of organizers, farmers and healers, Adaku Utah harnesses her seasoned skills as a political strategist, holistic healer, transformative facilitator, somatics coach and ritual artist as an act of love and commitment to her community. She enjoys co-cultivating social justice leaders and organizations to be more strategic, sustainable, and impactful.
